

U.S. Senator
Maria Cantwell
Washington

SNAPSHOT REPORT:
Attacks on the State of Washington's Tradition of Secure, Accessible Voting

The State of Washington has built a reputation over decades as one of the easiest places in the country to vote, while still maintaining high turnout and secure elections. We have done that by successfully pairing universal vote-by-mail, prepaid ballots, and same-day registration with strong safeguards like signature verification and centralized ballot tracking

Washington's model system has a long tradition of treating broad participation as a civic norm that transcends party labels. Both Democratic and Republican secretaries of state helped shepherd the transition to all-mail elections statewide by 2011, demonstrating bipartisan confidence that more convenient voting could coexist with strong security checks. In fact, while many red-leaning states passed laws restricting access to the ballot in the past few years, Washington enacted laws expanding ballot access. That record matches what Washingtonians have come to expect: a system where higher turnout is seen as evidence of a healthy democracy, not a problem to be solved.

Unfortunately, in an apparent effort to suppress turnout in ways that run counter to the values of Washingtonians, the Trump administration and many federally elected Republican members of Congress are attacking our elections on several fronts. If successful, it will be more difficult for Washingtonians to vote and voters' information will be less secure. Here are some of the ways our elections are under assault:

1. President Trump issued an executive order in March 2025 that sought, among other things, to withhold funding from states like Washington that count ballot received after Election Day -- even if they were postmarked by Election Day.
2. Trump's Justice Department is suing 24 states and the District of Columbia -- including our state -- in an attempt to force state officials to give the administration our voting rolls, which include personal data that Washingtonians didn't agree to make public.
3. Under the Trump Administration, the U.S. Postal Service issued a rule stating that postmarks no longer need to match the date that an item was mailed. So if you mail your ballot on Election Day -- or even days before -- it could be rendered invalid by a post-Election-Day postmark.
4. The Republican National Committee is challenging in court the election administration practices of states like Washington that permit the counting of mail ballots that are postmarked by Election Day to be counted when they are received within a certain number of days after Election Day. The Supreme Court will hear arguments in that important case, Watson v. Republican National Committee, this spring.
5. And House Republicans are pushing the SAVE America Act, a "show your papers" mandate that would require Americans to present, in person, either a passport or birth certificate to election officials in order to register to vote or change anything on their registration, like a name or address.

The argument Republicans make to impose these requirements is that there is widespread voter fraud. This claim doesn't hold up to the facts. The conservative Heritage Foundation, which tracks voter fraud, found just 15 cases of voter fraud in Washington state between 1982 and 2025. That's a rate of about one case in the entire state every three years. In that same 43-year period, they found only 1,620 cases nationwide. That's an average of only about three dozen cases across the entire country per year. By comparison, about 154 million Americans voted in the 2024 election.

This report details the burdens that these efforts would place on Washingtonians who now enjoy the safety and convenience of our vote-by-mail system.

The Bureaucratic Burden of the SAVE America Act

The SAVE America Act will require voters to present proof of citizenship in person at election offices when registering or re-registering to vote. The documents that can prove one's citizenship are a U.S. passport or an original or certified copy of a birth certificate that matches the name on the person's ID.

According to the Center for American Progress, approximately 2.8 million citizens in Washington do not have a passport. In addition, about 1.6 million women in Washington state who have taken their spouse's name do not have a birth certificate matching their legal name.

Sen. Cantwell's office identified:

- How much these new requirements could cost Washingtonians
- A new analysis showing the incredible long drives Washingtonians could face to get to their own county's election office
- After discussion with election experts, case studies of the paperwork burdens that the SAVE America Act would place on specific types of Washingtonians.

Costs of Obtaining Required Documentation

Anyone who doesn't have an original copy of their birth certificate would need to order a certified copy to make changes to their registration, or present a passport.

The cost of a passport for first-time adult applicants is \$165, plus any fees for getting passport photos. Moreover, according to the State Department, current processing times to obtain a passport average between four and six weeks. "Expedited" service can reduce that to between two and three weeks, but requires an additional $60 fee. An applicant can also request one- to three-day delivery in addition to the expedited service, but at an additional cost of $22.05. A person who had a U.S. passport in the past, but is unable to submit it as evidence of their U.S. citizenship along with their application must pay an additional $150 "file search" fee.

This is the cost to order a certified birth certificate in Washington's five most populous counties.

County	Cost

Counties With Longest Drives to the Election Office

The SAVE America Act's requirement of presenting papers in-person to a county elections official would impose another cost for voters registering to vote ahead of an election -- the time of traveling to one's county election office. This would be the case even for those who would later vote by mail. Even King County, the most populous in Washington state, only has one elections office location, in Renton.

For many residents of Washington state, getting to their county's election office could require a two-hour round-trip drive or longer.

A New Paperwork Burden No Washingtonian Wants

Currently, most counties only have one election office, and that office is only open during business hours. For many Washingtonians, a visit to an elections office would be a new and unwanted burden. The rush to make changes just before an election would be an extraordinary burden on election officials and voters who may have to wait in long lines.

For many Washingtonians – from the second shift worker, to the stay-at-home mom, to an agricultural worker who spends long days on the farm or in the field, to the tech worker who works 10-12 hour days - carving out an hour or much more to drive to an elections office would be disruptive, if not impossible.

These challenges would only be compounded for anyone without access to a car, or is disabled or elderly, since the trip could be even longer and more challenging. For example, the fastest public transit route from downtown Seattle to King County's Renton elections office takes nearly an hour and requires walking more than a mile. Those in rural areas may not even have a transit option.

In Washington state, we have always stood for making voting secure, easy, and accessible. Layering new federal mandated Georgia- or Texas-style barriers onto Washington's already secure and high-participation system does not align with the lived experience of Washington voters, who appreciate and depend on getting a ballot in the mail, having ample time to return it, and trusting that election officials are focused on both access and integrity—not looking for new ways to keep people away from the ballot box.
